

Sparklehorse founder made haunting music

Mark Linkous created fractured songs that told of sparrows, "painbirds" and junebugs; fabulous meditations on the beauty and impermanence of life. The American singer-songwriter, who has killed himself aged 47, worked with the Flaming Lips, Daniel Johnston and Danger Mouse, but is best known for the spectral country-folk music he recorded as Sparklehorse. His songs were infused with a strong sense of intimacy and place, chronicling what he called "the dangerous, spooky part of the south".

Frederick Mark Linkous was born into a coalmining family in Arlington, Virginia on September 9, 1962. His musical epiphany came through hearing the Animals' House of the Rising Sun, a sensation he described as "louder than a dirt bike". In his youth, he began absorbing the regional country sounds of George Jones and the Stanley Brothers, before falling in love with punk acts such as the Sex Pistols and the Damned.

By the time he was 12, his parents had divorced. He went to high school in Charlottesville and became, by his own admission, a "juvenile delinquent". In his late teens, Linkous and his band, the Dancing Hoods, lit out for New York and Los Angeles, but after two unsuccessful albums - 12 Jealous Roses (1986) and Hallelujah Anyway (1988) - he returned, disillusioned, to Virginia.

Hearing Tom Waits's album Swordfishtrombones inspired Linkous to start afresh. He formed the Johnson Family, a band that played only "300-year-old Irish songs" and began fashioning new tracks with the same purity of spirit as those old-time tunes. The band morphed into Salt Chunk Mary, although nothing was ever released on record. Sparklehorse was formed on the same guiding principles in early 1995, with Linkous supported by a mutating cast of musicians.

That year's Vivadixiesubmarinetransmissionplot was a bewitching debut album. It was recorded in the dead of night, with Linkous's voice often little more than a whisper, the music creaking with electric guitars, ambient noise and odd bursts of static. Songs such as Homecoming Queen and Spirit Ditch, the second of which included a phone message from his mother, were as unpredictable as they were fragile. At other times the band rocked out like antsy old punks. The album didn't sell, but its impact was felt by critics and musicians alike.

Radiohead promptly took Sparklehorse on tour. Then, one night in 1996, in a London hotel room, Linkous overdosed on Valium and antidepressants. Fourteen hours passed before he was found unconscious, his legs pinned beneath him so he had lost circulation. When paramedics tried to straighten them, he had a heart attack. He spent six months in a wheelchair, enduring seven operations to save his legs.

Linkous was troubled by depression for most of his life. The album Good Morning Spider (1998) was seen as a commentary on his near-death experience, yet he claimed that most of it was written before the incident. The third Sparklehorse album, It's a Wonderful Life (2001), was another haunted affair, this time featuring Waits and P.J. Harvey.

Linkous produced Fear Yourself, the 2003 album by another anguished singer-songwriter, Daniel Johnston, and oversaw an album of Johnston covers the next year. One of these songs, Like a Monkey in the Zoo, was recorded by Linkous's good friend Vic Chesnutt, who killed himself last year.

Sparklehorse's next album, Dreamt for Light Years in the Belly of a Mountain (2006), with Waits on piano, was produced by Brian Burton, aka Danger Mouse. This led to a further collaboration between Linkous and Danger Mouse. Dark Night of the Soul was a project featuring Iggy Pop, Gruff Rhys, Chesnutt and others. The resulting CD and book, with photographs taken by the film director David Lynch, will be released this year.

Linkous described those sessions as a "happy time", adding: "I didn't get into my brain too much because I didn't have time to, like I usually do when I make music in solitary situations."

His manager, Shelby Meade, has confirmed Linkous had been working on a new album. He is survived by his wife, Teresa, parents Frederick and Gloria, and three brothers.
